B. Read the following passage and choose the best answer from the alternatives. [10]

The university administration faced growing pressure from students, faculty members, and parents. While many acknowledged that student participation in democratic processes was an important aspect of higher education, others questioned whether the increasing influence of national political parties was undermining the university's academic mission. Some faculty members argued that universities should remain spaces for critical thinking and independent learning rather than becoming extensions of national political competition. Others believed that completely separating politics from universities was neither practical nor desirable, as universities have historically played an important role in promoting democratic awareness and in producing future political leaders. The debate extended beyond the university campus. Local newspapers published editorials expressing different opinions. Some writers praised student organizations for raising important issues such as educational reform, inclusion, and social justice. The Gurukul system of education has been an important part of South Asian educational history for centuries. According to the Ministry of Education, Nepal, more than 1,500 students are currently enrolled in traditional Gurukul schools across the country. Ramesh, a student from a rural village, joined a Gurukul at the age of twelve. Although he initially found the disciplined lifestyle challenging, he gradually developed confidence, self-control, and a deep respect for learning through the guidance of his guru. In the Gurukul system, students live with their teacher, receive instruction in subjects such as language, philosophy, ethics, and religious texts, and learn values like honesty, discipline, and service alongside academic knowledge. For example, many Gurukul students begin their day with meditation, participate in community service, study Sanskrit scriptures, and engage in discussions that encourage critical thinking and moral development. Therefore, the Gurukul system continues to be valued because it promotes holistic education by combining intellectual growth with moral character, practical life skills, and a strong sense of social responsibility.
